1 Background & Research Objectives

Superbrands use a comprehensive selection process to identify Singapore's strongest brands within both the B2C and B2B category.

For the B2C (consumer) category, Superbrands uses opinion polling to assess which brands are consumers' favourite across a range of categories. Through opinion polling, a total of 106 consumer categories were voted on in September 2012.

This polling included a sample of 1,500 consumers in Singapore aged 18-55 years old and excluded anyone working in media, public relations, advertising, market research and those organisations specific to Superbrands and affiliated organisations.

Consumers were asked to vote on their "favourite brand" based on the following statement for various categories:

"Which brand of (CATEGORY) would you say is your favourite brand? It may be a brand you are currently using or it could be based on your perception of the brand."

'First mention' votes and 'other mention votes' were recorded and the results have been provided to Superbrands through excel reports.

This document reports on the survey method, sample and awareness of Superbrands, and their views of the award itself.

2 Method

The consumers were sampled through online access panels. Since the number of categories was very long (106 in total), it was decided to split these categories into three panels, each testing 30-40 categories each.

Each panel was matched in terms of demographic profile according to age, gender, and ethnicity.

4 Findings

60% of consumers in Singapore are aware of the Superbrands award. Along with 'Singapore's Choice', Superbrands is the most recognisable brand award in Singapore, significantly ahead of 'Trusted Bands', 'Prestige Brands Awards', and Enterprise 50 Awards.

Those who recall either Superbrands or Singapore's Choice is 83% of all consumers.

Those in the 30-39 year old age group are more familiar with the Superbrands award (69%) probably by virtue of greater exposure to a range of consumer goods products, e.g. through retail outlets and generally buying a wider portfolio of products.

By far the most likely exposure to the Superbrands logo is on product packaging and advertisements within newspapers and magazines. Malay consumers are more likely to notice the Superbrands logo on product packaging (82%) whereas younger consumers (18-29 years old) are more likely to notice it on TV (51%).

About two-in-five have seen the Superbrands logo on websites, and this spans all ages and ethnic groups showing that even in the online world, the Superbrands logo is breaking through the clutter.

The Superbrands logo helps build brand equity for that category in a wide range of areas.

Mostly, it is about building reputation. Three-quarters of consumers agree that the logo is a statement that the product and service must have a good reputation. In tandem with this, association with this logo means it is a brand that can be trusted and puts it above other brands in the same category (where around 60% of consumers concur).

About half 'feel more confident to buy the brand' and also that the brand can consistently deliver on its promise.

For a third, Superbrands is also a statement of being 'good value for money', higher still with Malay consumers (at 43%) and one-in-five say they would be prepared to pay more for this brand if it had a Superbrands award.

It also follows that Superbrands will help to encourage recommendation, with 66% of consumers stating that they would be more likely to recommend a product or service with a Superbrands logo. This is higher among those in the 30s, but lower among 18-29 year olds.

Conclusion:

The results demonstrate that the Superbrands logo does a lot to build brand equity, mostly in terms of its reputation, and its ability to stand out from other brands in the category – something that is more important in 'crowded categories' such as consumer goods.

While only a minority agreed that they would pay a premium for Superbrands goods and services, when asked more directly far more consumers said they would be more likely to pay a price premium for a product or service with a Superbrands logo, trial the product or service, and recommend the product or service to others.

Hence such an award would represent good return on investment both in terms of increasing sales for the product, and margin on those sales.

The area where consumers agreed least in terms of the Superbrands endorsement is 'staying loyal to the brand' (at 16%), demonstrating that consumers are both demanding, but also quite fickle, e.g. willing to switch brands when others outperform their current favourite brand. This demonstrates the importance to brand owners of maintaining best in class status to sustain their market position.
